High.“This is not a referendum on the war in Iraq,” said one of the three members of the Commission on Presidential Debates, an ongoing reality in the event that the US is too far gone to elect a president. But the moderators themselves have been dealing with a gross miscalculation on the part of the Democrats and in large part because of a botched schedule. You’d be hard pressed to find a group of people more willing to talk about Iraq than they are to talk about the war — particularly when we’re in a post-Saddam world, when almost every aspect of life in Iraq is a hopeful sign. But the few questions they’ve asked about the war seem to have come from the remains of a group that are trying to hew to the unfamiliar norms of 24-hour news networks. Whatever the reason, these questions about the war have been inadequate. They asked nothing about the anti-war movement, nothing about whose fault the situation is in Iraq, and nothing about how the conflict is going. What they did do, however, was to simply ask if the candidates believed the US would be involved in military action in Iraq and they did so in the context of defining the nature of the war on terror. One might say this is a given./ Copyright (c) 2013-2014, 2018, 2019, DEY, LLC.
